

Jeopardy in Class

Jeopardy can be used in class to enhance learning. I will use it as a means of revision over what I have taught my class. It will be an interesting activity that allows the students to go over the materials in a fun motivating way. In addition, the students can be competing not only while playing but also in selecting which questions will be added to the jeopardy game.

My class will play jeopardy at the end of every unit. This will allow them to go over the important information in the unit. Each student will be asked to write down one important question that is relevant to what we have learned. They have to write down the correct answer to the question and why they think it is important. I will use these questions as a question bank for the game.

I will use these unit questions to create a larger jeopardy game at the end of the year. This time, it will include questions that cover the entire curriculum. It will be used to show students that they still need the information they have learned even after we are done with that unit. It will be a great way to sum up everything they have learned and recall all the previous information.

To play jeopardy, I will divide the class into four groups. Each group will play it separately, giving a chance for each student to participate. I will choose one student to be in charge of calculating the points for each group. The winner from each group will then compete with one another.
