

Padlet

Padlet could be a great tool for the classroom. The first idea that comes to mind is that students could use it as an online presentation board to post all of the projects that they have completed during the school year. That way their work is in one single place instead of floating around over several different outlets. Padlet would also be a great resource for teachers to use as a lesson board. This means that everything they are planning to use for that day or that week's lesson, could be posted in one place. It would also make it easier for students and subs to access and stay on track. The website could also be a great way for students to interact and ask questions with one another, especially if they are needing help with one particular spot in an assignment. Overall, this is a very helpful tool that I could definitely see myself using in my future classroom.

On-line Tools

There are so many different online tools to use in the classroom. They are broken into different types and categories depending on which one you would like to use. I could see them being a great enhancement for any lesson because of the large variety. Using the ones that I have chosen, like Kahoot!, they could be used to aid in review or to sum up a lesson. The tools to collaborate on group work, like Google, are a great way for students to learn how to work together, or to make communication more accessible. There wasn't really anything that I dislike about using tools in the classroom because they are just an enhancement. They are there to help the student become more knowledgeable on the assignment while also helping the teacher get the lesson across to the student in a more engaging way.
