

Padlet could be used in my classroom as a stream for helpful resources if my students are working on a project. There could be examples posted so if the students are struggling, they can have a helpful guide. This could also be used to help students if they miss class. Ideas and examples from the day can be uploaded so they can review and not fall behind in class. This would also be fun to use for parents to see pictures of their students and this would be much more secure than using social media.

I thought I found some cool online tools that made me think about my classroom. I never really envisioned what I would use but this project made me think about the teacher I want to be. I thought the focus booster would not only be great for my classroom, but also for me as I go into finals week. It can be hard for me to give myself breaks and that is a great way to do it. I have also had so many teachers preach giving students a break and that is a hands-free way to monitor that. I really liked that they had features where the parents could be involved. Sometimes I worry about not involving parents enough but tools like classroom dojo allow for parents to see how their students are doing without having to directly contact me. I think the thing I liked the most is all of these tools would make my life easier as a teacher while also benefitting my students.
